Wall walk : South Gate to Prasat Chrung SW

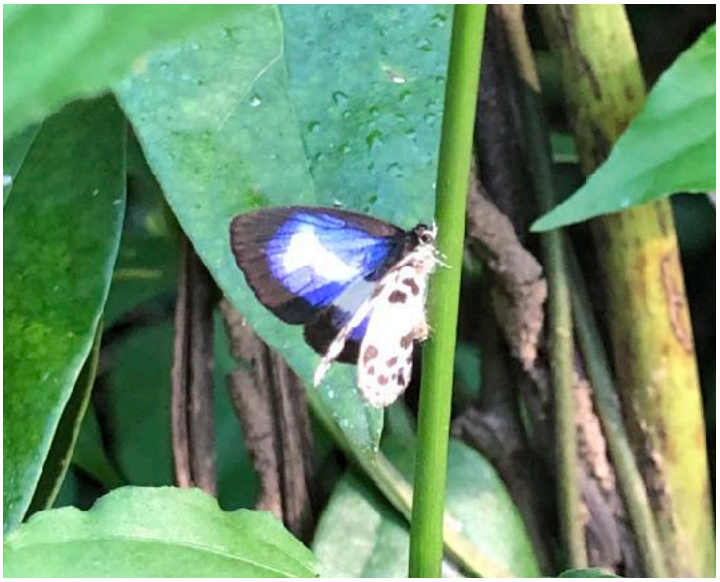

The South Gate in the early morning sunshine (from a distance).

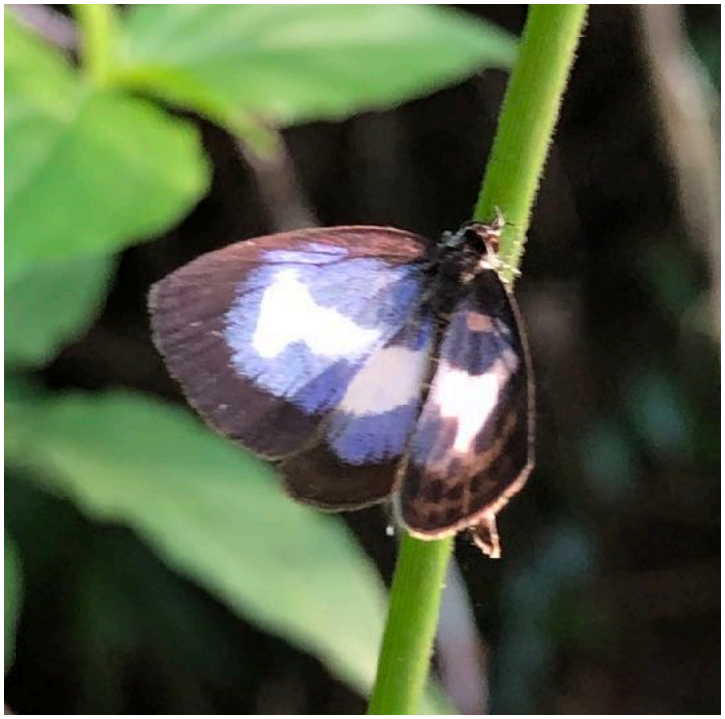

More fungi on the path.

The sunshine brings out the butterflies.

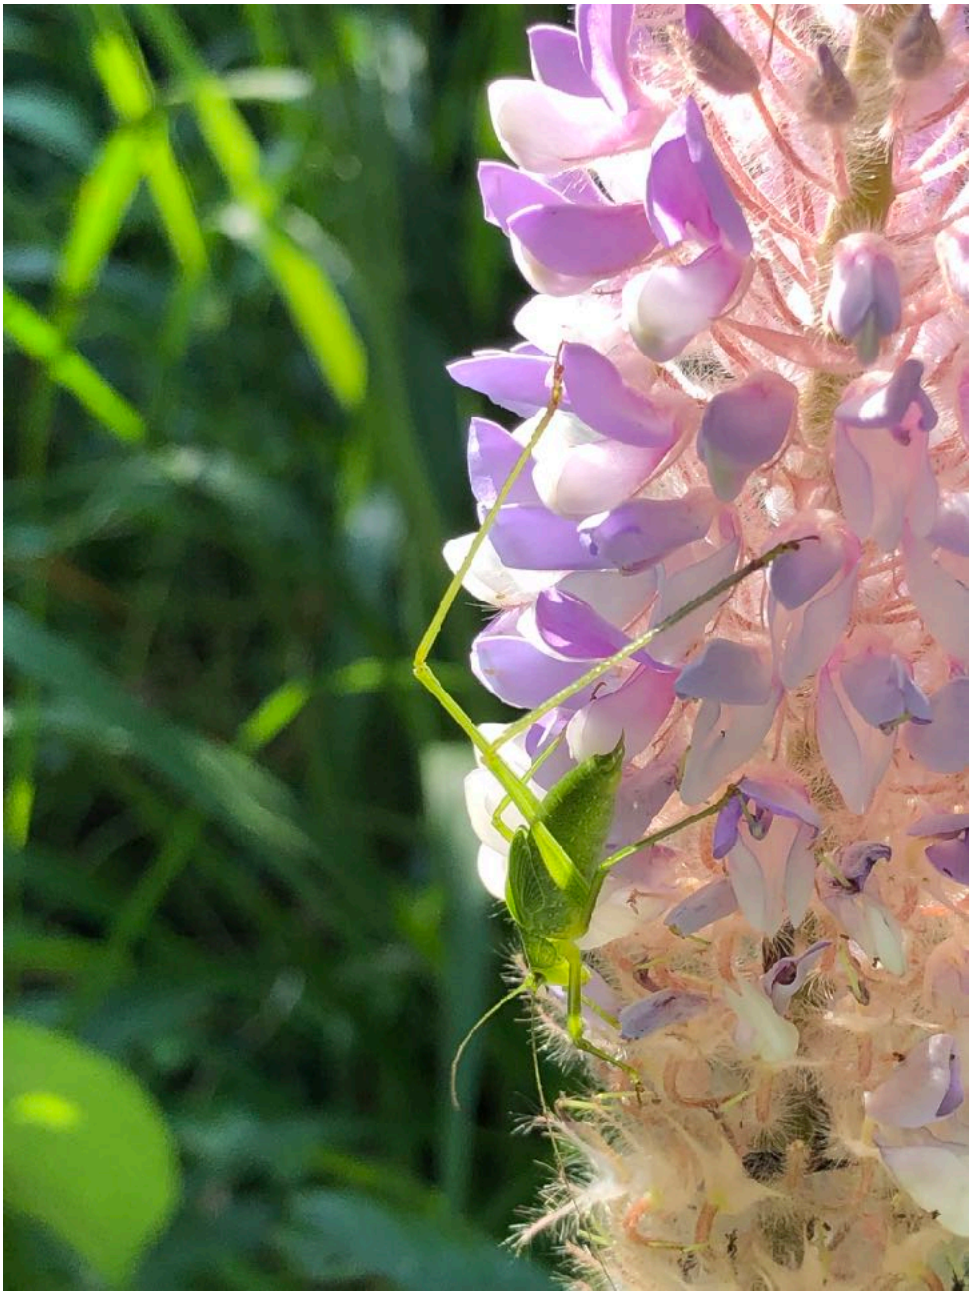

Inside the wings of the little butterfly with the white wings with black spots, there are fluorescent blue markings.

The south moat.

A butterfly enjoying the sunshine.

Contrast.

The sunshine draws out the lizards too.

This is the other red dragonfly.

This is a new butterfly for us.

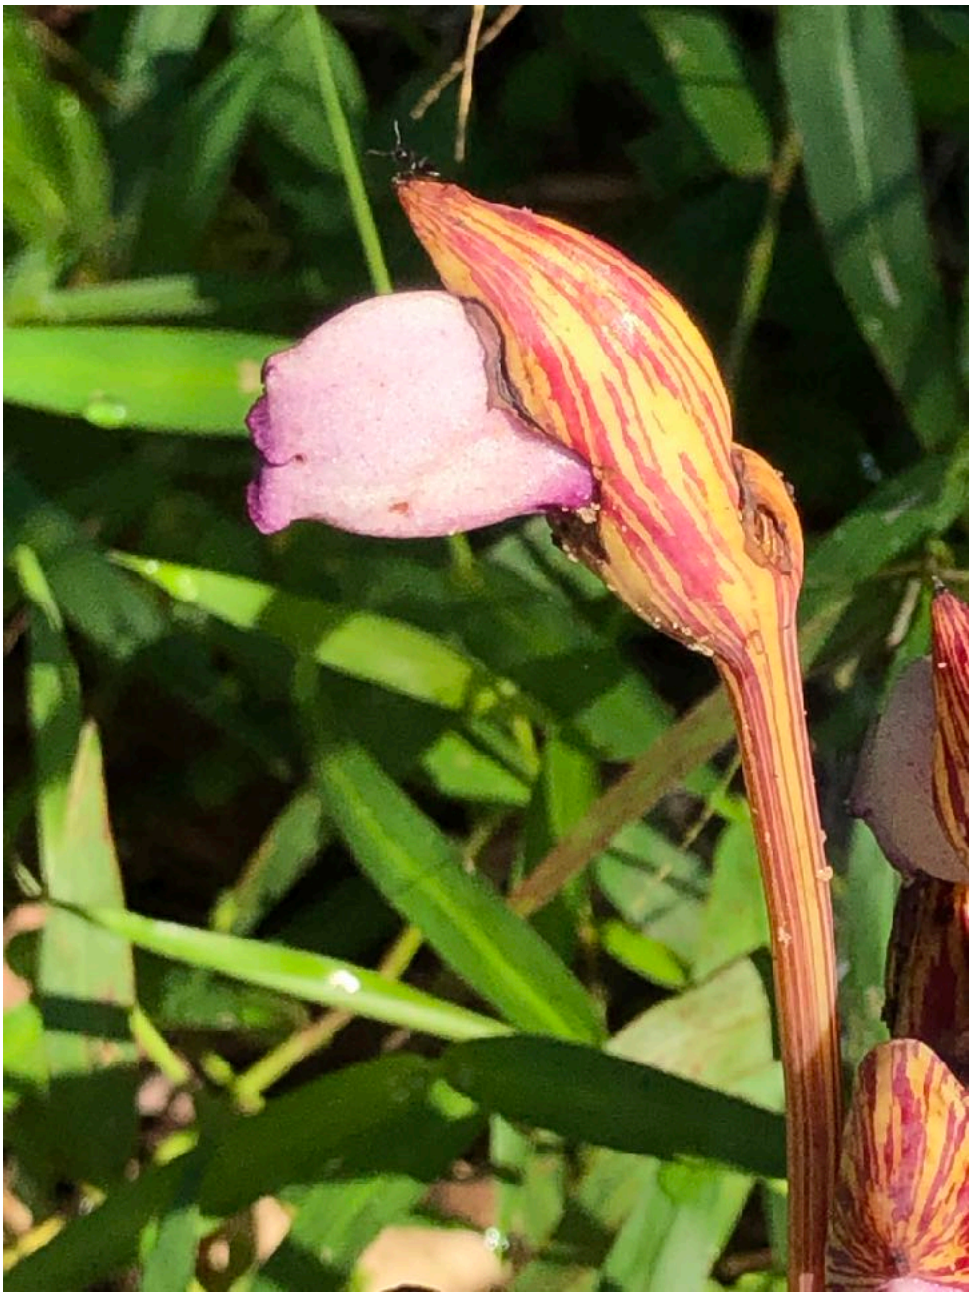

This is also a new butterfly for us.

The third new butterfly on this walk.

And these are parasitic plants… lilies?

Prasat Chrung, South West

And a crab, in the grass at the corner temple. He waved his big claw at David’s shoe.

And an amazing caterpillar. An internet search says it's a Common Evening Brown butterfly caterpillar.

We missed the rhinoceros beetles on the way to the temple at the corner. We found eight of them on this tree on the way back. The male has the “rhino horn”.

This is one of the common dragonflies.

Near the South Gate, you can hire a gondola.

David made a new friend.

It was a busy morning.
